

The Craven Herald.

Saturday 3rd February 1877.

Wilson Wood Colliery.

About a month ago the large pumping engine at the Wilson Wood Colliery broke down, and several days elapsed before it could again be brought into working order. The consequences are that the men have been working day and night at the Moorgarth Colliery. It must be remembered that if the large engine stands a few hours the water rises to such a pitch that the workmen are debarred from work for a considerable time. However, on Sunday last the water was nearly cleared from the workings, when a second breakage took place, but through the energy of the manager and the engineer all was made right on Tuesday, and we are happy to say that all is now in good working order.